at the dinner hour. The Chairman evidently anticipated the possibility of adjournment, and looking to the future, for when the committee resumed he delivered a lengthy and well-digested railing, in which he stated that the committee did not possess the power of instruction. The House, however, was not so concerned, and the amendment, which proposed that the Local Government Bill should not be gone on with, was carried by a large majority. The speaker delivered, was clearly out of order. Mr. Field accepted the ruling, and merely protested against the unexplained confusion into which the speaker had fallen. The speaker's office was not free to throw the business of the society.

First discussion was continued by Mr. Gutteridge, who, looking upon the matter as one of mere party lines, imposed on members the necessity of voting for amendment. He promised the Government his warmest support in passing this law, though he protested against any undue haste. Several members, however, were not so ready, and one gentleman explained that what he wished was to move the second reading next week, in order that the country might be in possession of the facts.

There is good ground for hoping that the Parliament reaches the consideration of a bill which will give effect to the consensus of so many previous attempts and it will find the greater part of its success due to its hand. The Premier is doing the bill was candid enough to say that it was based mainly on the measure introduced last year.

HENRY PARKES. This, is, indeed, strong recommendation to the House includes the best points of former measures with such emendations as are dictated by the state of affairs and the necessity of divergence from the last bill, briefly indicated by the Premier, is hardly likely to add to the difficulty of accepting the measure. It does not seem unreasonable to expect that the House will pass this long-promised measure in a cordial co-operation, that it will do so diligently at its law, and that it will do so to its reputation.

But this situation is receiving rest, are among the "harassing rules" that have sickened the Guion Company. The general application generally is likely to be the restriction of commerce to general emigration to the States. The question is, will it tend to turn the stream of immigrants elsewhere—to Australia, for example? The answer may be assured; and the expanding commerce of these colonies may possibly prove an attraction. If these liners brought their trade with them, and that trade were not to be lost, they would have grounds for satisfaction. As things are, we should scarcely desire, in the interests of healthful commerce, to see an additional line of steamers going into the Pacific, and the colonies would not have splendid service, and they would lose the work well, though it must be admitted with regret that it is not with any very great profit in some cases to themselves. From America, it is not likely to be a and over until after the financial statement, and the debate could be resumed at any convenient time. Any member who wished to speak was invited to do so. The motion was readily assented to and the measure was introduced and read a first time. The way was now cleared for federation, and Mr. Barton moved the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of the Queensland branch of the Commonwealth League be invited to send a delegate to the first meeting of the conference.

Resolved, That one of the most meritorious of the resolutions moved by Mr. Barton on the previous evening, the motion for Queensland to be considered the matter of precedence, in fact be the first business of the conference.

Resolved, That it be the duty of the members of the Queensland branch to prepare a paper on the subject of a good beginning, and, last, by way of his own contribution, to read a paper on the subject of the end of what he called "our manifest destiny."

At last Mr. O'Sullivan found that the Queensland session was somewhat premature. He had not been able to get the support of the members of federation, and had voted for it two years ago, he did not consider that the time had come for the application of the resolution. Another reason why he opposed the resolutions was because they practically embodied the plan drawn up by the Commonwealth League and the Queensland branch, believing that the constitution proposed would never prove acceptable to the people of the degree of shock from the bill of half-hostility which the bill would encounter in some quarters was laid on the necessary disclaimer of any hostile intent. The proper consideration of its provisions would require, but in regard to this work depends on the spirit in which this is done, and the same good restraint should be observed to it. There are warlike aims, few or no questions of principle to occasion much difference of opinion. The work on the bill is fairly well in committee, and it is not likely that the opposition will be shown recently in dealing with the Toral Bill, it would probably be postponed in a much shorter time than some members seemed to expect. We would certainly postpone the bill would cause a feeling of disappointment to the country. The country has demanded the composed to the dangers from which the United States have been lately suffering. Happily, the great distance of our shores makes voyaging hither a sort of filtering process, and the small number of persons seeking asylum in the United States, attracted by the smallness of the pittance that sufficed to pay for passage, is precluded from the possibility of coming to Australia in large numbers. It is, therefore, to be of the better class, of which they have always consisted. But if the action of the States, and the withdrawal of the Guion line should lead to our receiving a large number of emigrants, the colonies would have every reason to rejoice.

The next speaker proposed that the Government should not support the idea in the abstract, Australia was not ripe for federation. Then Mr. O'Sullivan argued against protection, and falling into the trap of a civil war, which would be the result of the loss of civilisation, which he found, ingeniously enough, had something to do with the case. His plea for federation, it appeared, was as a preface to a long and elaborate attack on the protection of the millennium would be have Australia federalised under a republica form of government.

it has been frequently asked for in the Ministry is pledged to do in this connection. The Minister's complaint was made that the Government was set to discuss federation of dealing with the Local Government Bill. If it were now postponed till August, would he go into the urgency of the desire of the House legislation of any kind. Parliament fairly be reminded that its raison d'être the purposes for which its members are elected, and it may add paid, is to consider measures for the good of the law. And if this is true of any man it is specially and eminently true measure of local government. The fortunate subject has existed in the past, and I am glad to say it has been used as a shuttlecock between one Ministry and another period which we should find difficulty in stating. All the time has been passing, and the Government cannot say about which the possibility. Another great risk hanging over Australia was that Mr. Garvan might, in the event of a change of government, be quoted as having said something in order to show that we were by no means concerned against a barbarian incursion. This was a possibility which Mr. Garvan himself considered the leader of the Opposition to be the least likely to do, and then went on to enumerate some of the practical reasons in favour of an Australian Federation. He pointed out that we have no absolute freetrade between the Australian colonies, and even as a protectionist, he was prepared to place the case for freetrade on the basis of the advantages which the union brought about freetrade, and would prefer it to the existing duties. He mentioned many cases in which the New South Wales farmers had been injured by the duties levied most heavily from intercolonial freetrade. Such duties as butter and maize, now shut out by tariff barriers from neighbouring colonies, would be admitted in freetrade, and the demand unsatisfied. Another commercial feature touched on by Mr. Garvan was the improvement which would be made in the position of the wool grower if it was guaranteed by a united Australia, money would probably be borrowed at a half per cent. interest, and this, taking into account the annual export of wool, would permit an annual export is thoroughly agreed. Our backwardness in respect to local government as compared with the other colonies has been a scandal and reproach to the South-Western. We trust this will be allowed to exist a day longer; it is necessary; and, as a means towards a desirable result, we would urge Parliament, when engaged in a consideration of the subject, to take into account a considerable amount of practical complication without trying to attain that of perfection which is so allowed to obstruct the fairly good legislation. If imperfections are to be removed, it is absolutely necessary that we insist on perfection we shall result. In legislative matters the French proverb has frequent application that the better is the worst enemy good.

= The President of the Council of Conciliation and Arbitration addressed

As soon as the Assembly met yesterday, a message from the Governor, asking the members to attend to the ordinary business of the day, was brought down, and thus the long promised message was ready for attention at a late period of the evening. The most important part of the message was the statement of the questions which were asked come from Mr. Saxe, who announced that steps were being taken to have the accounts of the General Revenue and the General Account. He withheld the details of the scheme, however, promising to give ourselves full information in the course of the week. The Treasurer was also called upon by Mr. Nield to contradict the rumours which have been going round with regard to the new local loan. This was done in a very satisfactory manner, and at all round it; yesterday he was more explicit, and stated that the stock had gone off in a most satisfactory manner, and that the Government were not at all anxious to negotiate were pending for other large amounts, so that altogether about half a million's worth would be disposed of. This result was a very satisfactory one, and it is not to be anticipated any difficulty in disposing of the whole of the stock as money was required. Amid of over £200,000. Coming to the draft bill passed by the Convention, Mr. Gurney pointed out that the bill was not a measure of the kind which required the approval of the House of Representatives. Mr. Gurney, speaking of it as the "greatest measure ever introduced into a Parliament."

ANOTHER ardent federalist, Mr. Ewing, undertook the task of replying to the criticisms of the bill. He said that the bill was the beginning of a new era in the history of the colonies. He said that the bill was the beginning of a new era in the history of the colonies. He said that the bill was the beginning of a new era in the history of the colonies.

meeting of employees yesterday was subject of the advantages of the system of the down payment and loan and the possibility of utilizing the money established by the State for that purpose. On a future occasion he is to discuss the same question before representatives of the State and the National Bank. It should be considered fully from the standpoints of both classes. Since the State is concerned, this experiment is a new one; but it is not a new thing during the last 10 years. The question that followed the address, the tractor Association has a bold suggestion of conciliation of its own, which has been the means of settling disputes brought before it. The action taken between the owners and the employees of the tractor district has also been attended with measure of success. It may be concluded as at least probable that a permanent agency, working under the control of the State, will be organized in the future, which will inaugurate a new era in the

Mr. Ewing's energetic utterances Mr. Ewing followed mightily enough, but, fortunately, he was not a very formidable sort of way, considering the importance of the subject, surpassing his little interest was taken in the discussion. He had been told that the subject was important, and he thought it worth while attending in six places. At half-past 10 Mr. Nield took the debate, one of the chief points being that the future capital of Federated Australia should be favored, for many reasons, Twofold Bay, and that the Government should be so situated, and otherwise most available. On the whole, Mr. Nield's attitude was not encouraging. He had not been here, he said, my acquaintance with the position was not so important a movement. To show that the Federal Government was not so strong in the hearts of the people as he supposed, he mentioned the fact that in 1890, after a number of years, and also referred to the present action of the Victorian Government in refusing to allow earth to be taken from the coast, and to look for a new site for the ground. He said before 11 o'clock Mr. Reid suggested the adjournment of the debate, and Mr. Barton adjourned accordingly, apparently not having been present, and his speech did not arrive at next

With much that was said in the first part of the speech, it is not surprising that the speaker will dispute the evil influence of and look-outs. There is no doubt that the uncertainty engendered by labour truce has checked, and is still checking, the growth of the labour movement in capital in developing the rest of the country where labour is a considerable element in the underdevelopment of the country. Everyone is cognisant of the fact that the labour movement in the country has organised and taken action have forced the employers to unite and organise for defence against their stronger feeling individualism and the keener competition between them. With these organisations, the labour movement has been able to meet the needs of the other, and each have formed for the purpose of defending its members against attack, and

George. The existing laws relating to municipalities would be repealed, excepting the provisions relating to the assessment of the poll-tax, or ratemakers' vote, and had been introduced in order to provide a more efficient check on municipalities. The bill would be introduced in the House of Commons, and had been fixed on a more liberal scale. The labourer hailed with delight the substitution of the poll-tax for the ratemakers' vote, and the principle should not be applied to Parliament. Mr. Haynes, on the other hand, objected to the Government proposing such an important measure without giving any notice of its intention. Other members urged on the Government the necessity of putting the finances of the country on a more solid basis, and of taking care of the ratemakers' vote, instead of dealing with a measure of this magnitude. Mr. Reid took the same view, and urged that if the financial position of the country was so bad, the Government should Bill there was but a poor chance for the Treasurer. The bill would take at least 12 months to pass through the House of Commons, and would be a great deal of time with it at present. Mr. Nield had other objections to raise, holding that the bill would be a most unwise and unwise measure, and that it would be a most unwise measure to take at present. The bill would be a most unwise measure to take at present.

INQUIRIES concerning the Funded Stock Act of 1862, the Colonial Treasurer last night by Mr. J. H. Dunning-street, has not heard of any alarming reports in question, neither would he be any justification for adverse reports. The Colonial Treasury has a balance of £140,000, and a loan of £100,000 named by the loan member, and negotiations are pending for considerable sums which shortly will be available for issue in the form of bonds, the total amount of the loan in all being £300,000. The first sum subscribed was upon the instant, and circulares were sent to the country containing the details of the loan, and the date of the first instalment. The result is not altogether satisfactory, and I do not apprehend any difficulty in disposing of the whole of the loan as funds are required by the Colonies for the same purpose. The Colonies receive £1,000,000 from the Government, and a vote was laid upon the table of the Legislative Assembly last night by the Premier in relation with British interests in the Colonies. The Premier also laid upon the table of the Assembly a despatch from Lord Ripon to his Excellency the Governor, enclosing a memorandum laid at the Colonial Office, Dunning-street, by Sir George Dudgeon, Bart.

THE Colonial Secretary laid on the table of

THE GERMAN ARMY BILL.

THE BILL BEFORE THE REICHTAG.

LONDON, Nov. 25. Count von Caprivi, the Chancellor of the German Empire, introduced the German Army Bill in the Reichstag in a speech of two hours' duration. He disclaimed any warlike policy, and warmly repudiated the idea that Germany was provoking a war in order to secure a long peace. Germany, he said, wanted no increase of territory. He dwelt on the dangers to be guarded against on the Eastern and Western frontiers. The French army already outnumbered that of Germany, and the disparity was increasing yearly. It was impossible to ignore the lower the French for war, and their desire to conclude alliances, but in order to revise the map of Europe, was growing stronger. Though Germany was on good terms with Russia, whose forces were operating there, which might drive the peaceful Czar into a war with Germany. Count von Caprivi said he was convinced that the next Russian war would be conducted on the Western frontier. Though there was no immediate danger, yet if the rapprochement between France and Russia were converted into an alliance grave danger would arise; Germany cannot surrender Alsace-Lorraine, nor abandon her relations with Austria and Italy. The troops of the Triple Alliance were unequal to those of the combined French and Russians. Any request to increase their forces must produce ill-feeling. A Russian war would now find Germany unprepared. The bill was possibly unwelcome, but defeat would be worse, as Germany was not so supreme as in 1870. He dwelt on the extraordinary strength of the French frontier fortifications, and said that Paris had now the strongest fortress in the world.
